It pays to weatherstrip doors and windows!

Extension specialists at V. P. I. say cracks around doors and windows can account for as much as 25 per cent of the heat loss in the average home.

Weatherstripping alone will cut down both heat losses and drafts, and the savings in fuel and increased comfort soon justify the cost. When weatherstripping is used along with insulation and storm windows, the benefits increase.

The best weatherstripping is the metal kind which requires grooves cut into the window sashes and frames. This kind of installation requires special tools in the hands of a skilled workman.

However, there are several other good kinds of weatherstripping on the market which can be tacked to the sash or frame.

The cheapest kind is felt which comes in a roll. It will give reasonably good service for one or two seasons, but tends to shrink and break, and then needs replacing.

A more durable and effective type is made of light metal or wood with a felt interior. The felt protrudes far enough to make a tight seal between the sash and frame.

Directions for installing each kind usually are provided by the manufacturer. One general rule is to have the windows or doors closed and locked while attaching the strips. This makes for a closer fit and better seal.

If the crack at the bottom of the door is too wide to be sealed with weatherstripping alone, screw a strip of wood to the bottom edge of the door.

Sometimes there are other cracks and small openings around door and window frames which should be closed with caulking compound. It is usually possible to borrow or rent a caulking gun to apply the compound properly.
